DIGITAL LITERACY

#herenot

Media Literacy Week (Nov. 10 to 17, 2023) is themed #herenot and is about responding to each other respectfully online.

Online, we are constantly interacting with each other. Without thinking about it and with a screen between us, even a hurtful comment is quickly posted. Do we always have to agree with each other? Certainly not. Asking critical questions, commenting or expressing your opinion is allowed and keeps us sharp as a society. But there are limits.

And no less than 70% of the Dutch population also thinks things should be different. That's why, during Media Literacy Week, we say: #herenot.

DIGITAL LITERACY

How do you start the conversation at home about Media Literacy?

What questions can you ask and how Mediawise are you yourself as a parent? In this issue of the digital magazine WIJS you will find tips on media education, screen time and apps.

Would you like to do more within the theme of Media Literacy? Then check out our website for all the activities organized by the Library during Media Literacy Week.

TIP FROM THE LIBRARY

HackShield

At home and in the Library: fight fake news and disinformation

The interactive game HackShield: an AR-game for children aged 8 to 12 is all about becoming digitally resilient while playing. Through an exciting game, children learn the dangers of the Internet and develop skills to counter these dangers. Together with main character Lux, players learn to recognize disinformation and deal with fake news. Players are trained to become Cyber Agents who can protect themselves and their surroundings from online danger. During Media Literacy Week, children can play this free game at the Witte Dame or at home by visiting
